WHY NOT ARBITRATION BOARDS?

A succession of riots such as have just occurred in Indiana and Colorado has no justification in a civilized community. When a band of strikers can tie up the traffic of a large city for days at a time and destroy property in utter defiance of law, there is certainly something wrong with the industrial machinery of that community. But the wrongs can never be satisfactorily adjusted by such procedure.

During the trouble in Indiana the striking street car operators exceeded the bounds of reason in the destruction of property, but on the other hand the street car company undoubtedly acted unwisely in refusing to recognize the union. As usual both sides were to blame in the matter. The only correct way to cope with this and similar situations is by the appointment of a state board of arbitration before whom both employers and workmen can lay their grievances for adjustment without resort to violence.

PHYSICAL EFFICIENCY.

A plea for all-round development as against specialization in athletics was the gist of a speech made recently by F. R. Benson, the celebrated English Shakespearean actor, at McGill University, Montreal.

Mr. Benson took for example the Greeks, whose physique art has made notable. He showed that although the Greek athletes did not strive for records, the Greeks were the most athletic race of their day. All-round development such as they had is obtained only by all-round exercise.

An all-round training would produce a man who would be healthy at 80, one who would always be ready for any physical emergency. And while it may be contended that many notable works were the products of a diseased brain, nevertheless, the healthy brain in a healthy body is the more efficient. Physical training is good to the extent that it makes the mind and body more efficient. The man who is in "training" all the time is the man who is equal to every emergency. To get physical efficiency should be the object and end of physical training.

About thirty members of the cadet corps went out to Rollins Spring Friday afternoon prepared to stay until this morning. Their camp stove and supplies were sent out on a wagon. The men carried their blanket rolls and haversacks. The small shelter tents were used.

They had intended to go farther than Rollins Spring but some of the men objected to missing the Drake game. Those who wanted to see the game came in and then returned to camp.
